Cherkin and others Little evidence is available on the cost-effectiveness of practices such as meditation and yoga, but the cost of acquiring the skills required for these practices, as well as the time costs of practicing them, are so low relative to conventional medicine that evidence of their clinical effectiveness might suffice to justify their use on economic grounds. Following European integration, subsidiarity, decentralization of the State and diffusion of multilevel governance, cities acquire normative and political power, rising as political actors.
